1. Introduction

Time takes and moves us dreaming pieces on as though its measures were that smiling face that we remember when all else is gone.

Why ask of purpose in this hurtful place that tells of other ways than what we are when first of inwardness and childhood grace?

And yet there stays for us perhaps some star whose homewarding will shed its tranquil light and guide belatedly, if from afar.

Some house or hill or tree, some common sight we saw unchanging on our evening strolls that yet will reverence its keepsake rite.

Not part of us, it's true, but which consoles us when we see some tended wayside shrine that speaks of comradeship in passing souls.

The rest we do not know. The swelling line of those who've gone before is endless night: untested always is the new-made wine.

Yet lives are various: each morning's bright with dowered majesty that's plain enough, if all the rest evade our mundane sight.

But these went questing on, a pathway rough or smooth, ascending suddenly, or kept to honest byways and parochial stuff.

They gave their lives to that, and overstepped the settled limits of their scope and time, to stare out earnestly while others slept.

Some used their gifts for image, word or rhyme, or those of music-giving, dancing, found in body's ecstasy their one sublime accomplishment. Still others, fenced around by darkening phantoms, made things fierce and rare, to reach the margins of more shadowed ground where wraiths alone survive. And yet it's there that we perhaps must learn to live instead, in hesitant but yet prevailing prayer.

For otherwise we are but ill words said, the lonely mindlessness churned up by days of reckoning in every wind-tossed head.

Two portals mark the ending of our ways, with lives that briefest interval between our looking onward and that backward gaze.

The dead are all about us in the no more seen, the desolating loss that nothing mends, the summer's happiness that should have been.

2. Alexander von Humboldt

Some men are born for what their future sends, and any more they need is quickly won by time, occasion and the help of friends.

My mind is clear, well organised, and one accommodating stiff bureaucracy that makes our Prussian state. As soon as done are detailed summaries required of me: each ruled as is my thought, methodical and rooted in proactive accuracy.

My day-to-day appointment book was full of famous names, indeed of Europe's best in all the sciences, and through their pull

I won appointments. Then as Bonpland's guest I toured through Venezuela, Cuba, saw the vast Americas, there laid to rest many a tale of what their people wore, their modes of dance and hunting from the snow-clad Andes to the rich Atlantic shore.

How crops were harvested, how best would grow the cotton, cacao and the sugarcane, the mines of Mexico, the points to know in their prospection, how the constant gain of knowledge helps both rich and poor, and plumed officialdom in titled Spain.

I published all my notes. Each volume bore the imprint of a well-appointed mind, the drawings illustrating some small store of what this world will offer, not confined to specialized and limiting debate, but what, adventuring, we all might find.

For man must trust his senses, not vacate that place to some preposterous deity when teeming nature is her own estate.

Abundantly she's eloquent, to be abroad in spectacles that make our hearts rejoice in rapt and blessed humility.

That world is one, albeit now the arts and sciences are disciplines so far from integrating they're but separate parts.

How beautiful the morning sunbeams are, the garden ways, the ceaseless beating wings that draw their energy from one small star.

No more than that, and yet its knowledge brings the warm benevolence of summer nights, an aching peacefulness when some bird sings the long day through in music that unites our heart-felt vision to a vibrant place where leafy miracles are natural sights.

Sometimes at evening with a wistful grace the poplar trembles with its silver leaves arrayed in concert where the light winds trace their own recitals round what heart conceives as woodland deity or sylvan sprite that trails her summer-coloured spangled sleeves.

So held our brooding forebears — who'd invite the spirits from some inward-templed day to guide their otherwise-directed sight.

We all of us contain that brighter ray of insight that the wiser statesmen will invest proposals with lest millions pay.

And all around are symphonies that fill our hearts with thankfulness: those listenings pass beyond this well-known house or field or hill, to dance belatedly, as summer grass will hold no record where our footsteps go, or what's emergent from the mirroring glass, but what our unrepentant senses know:

the breath of millions in that inner fire that animates this gladdening picture show.

3. Robert Herrick

Primitive and savage was Dean Prior and scarcely changing all my long years there:
folk fiercely silent in their black attire.

It was a banishment, though I would fare no worse than many of my company who would their worldly hopes and titles wear.

Yet from the muddy brook, if we would see, are drawn the smooth and sweetly running streams, reflecting earth and sky's confederacy.

We find a natural courtliness that deems itself the better for its unlaced charms, for all that women once were famous dreams.

Images I have of hands and arms that link and whirl above the pretty feet, that even in this place the Sabbath calms reflect but modesty — poor, plain and neat — defined by rough-cut stones and thistled field and gives but niggardly: no country seat that was my world before, a hope revealed in high connections and the famous names the expedition that I planned would yield towards preferment. Here my living tames the wildest longing, when the thirst for fame are sooted outlines in the candle flames.

A quiet existence, poor, and which became at times unconscionable and not enough for one whose company would seek acclaim from modish fashion, richly-fashioned stuff that gives advancement to a great divine where all is mundane here, and plain, and rough.

It is sufficient, though. I drink good wine and by a wedding speech am also blessed.
Pru cooks and does for me: the pewters shine.

Perhaps that rural order stays the best of all we once desired, from youth's fresh face to robes of purple for our final rest.

My verse is simple, then, and tries to place my what I hope are common, heartfelt thoughts within the homilies we all embrace.

In spring it is the golden, honeyed courts that daffodils will keep, or May's rich flowers, the downy sweetness that the air supports.

And those to me in thought, in passing hours, appeared more child-like trusting and sincere than I remembered of those erstwhile powers:

the lisp of courtier in the proffered ear, the favourite's rich-scented, pouting kiss, the steel effrontery of brigadier,

or swelling bodices of loosened bliss, the dayspring eyes whose splendour has the sun itself ascending look to be remiss.

Such plumes and titles that they had not won became to me brocaded, puffed up days beside the rapture of the spring begun in quiet coppice paths or passing ways beneath the ancient shadow of the oak, or meadowlands where sheep and cattle graze in rough contentment, where each colour spoke of long, hot days to come, of hay or corn to wreath the bonnets of their reaping folk.

What to these are ornamental lawn, or satin dresses as the night hours pass into the radiance of gathered dawn?

4. Marie-Henri Beyle

The ways of candid happiness were sparse enough, and mocked the bearing that my father made contingent on observing wealth and class.

A stiff conservative, and one who laid much weight on rule-bound duty to the state:
to me as fashioned out of puffed brocade.

What honesty can thrive on that, negate the love of precedent for simple good, or serve the interests of the truly great?

By which I mean Napoleon, who stood for discipline, for armies, peoples' right to choose whatever made for parenthood.

An international cause I kept, despite the war in Russia and the long retreat across the corpse-thick, numbing depths of white.

The towns and settlements and stocks of wheat lay burned before us, all their livestock killed to make predicaments the more complete.

And even I who shaved each day, fulfilled what oath and army duties must incur, knew effort here was only dully willed.

Not drawn as daylight blesses, as it were, but forced conscriptions out of dead-beat limbs that from their longed-for rest would scarcely stir.

Worse I have survived, and not on whims refused to deck myself with pinchbeck gaud for all that bold adventurer yet trims his sail to what the passing winds afford in passage out, or as a silk-thin glove more feels the upright vigour of the sword.

I gave myself to music, art and love, to dissipation most, of course. In time the coarse, bluff warrior was murmuring dove.

A dilettante in truth, and, lacking rhyme, I drew a potent fatness from the soil as champagne vines grow best on barren lime.

I wrote assiduously, and learnt the toil of making words evoke the would-be heart, and with the accuracy of pointed foil brought honest men to smile, and others smart.

I wrote of plain realities, as bring the soul's high mystery to common mart.

And most of love, which is a dangerous thing, that those who welcome it should rather try the innocence that nurtured summers bring.

Some woman's beautiful and takes our eye:
we note her carriage and her quiet tread that in their modesty still dawdle by.

Yet wraiths and demons fill that pretty head and apt companionship is worlds apart from hard and detonating pain instead.

For of one body then and beating heart, in hopeless gluttony of sprawling limbs, becomes the litany where all things start.

Imagination, therefore, that bedims our sober knowledge: what is hardly there becomes the object of our earnest whims.

She's what? An essence kindled from the air, a limpet entity we can't remove from conjurations of her scented lair.

In fevered hour on hour, we cannot prove that this is love or otherwise, but whet the appetite for what our hopes approve.

And in such conjurations we must let the sorrow salting round us crystallize to otherwise than what we shall forget.

All dreams, all suppositions, where our eyes are both participants and breathy gain of rich embodiments where custom lies.

And love from which we cannot long abstain will stay the one, still image in the glass to smile and haunt and give us hope again.

5. Alexander Scriabin

I met Rachmaninoff in Zverev's class where fifteen hours of practice turned the day from famous diligence to nightly farce.

A thickset, dour and troubled youth who'd play from first tuition to Conservatory in his precise and plain, plebeian way.

Those hands were webbed in steel that, by decree, he was to rule the sweep of glittering keys as does a packet-boat the stormy sea.

No, Sergei was never one for ease in work or comradeship or brief affairs, nor were his compositions there to please.

But built up as it were of mounting stairs to sovereign festivals in every chord, not things that came or crept up unawares as mine are apt to do, who can afford to be both Chopinesque and just myself, that composition be its own reward.

I toured, wrote music, taught a wealth of fresh new talent as the licensee will drink the profits into doubtful health.

But then there was his Symphony in D, which, frankly, no one liked, no, not a soul, as all in Petrograd were prompt to see.

What doubt and anguish then must take their toll of one who ruled his hands but not his head, who came on destiny he'd not control.

Three years went by, three burdening years of dread:
the gifts were fraudulent or never there, the rising prodigy now spent instead.

Three years of treatment, psychiatric care, repeating to himself he'd write again:
he would, he would: it was his constant prayer.

What melancholies spite us dreaming men, or with strange maladies infect the brain, which reason occupies but now and then?

And then the torment passed. My friend was sane.
That C-sharp-minor Prelude went before and made him what he was, and would remain:

the best of concert pianists. A score of compositions followed, then the songs beloved of everyone. Who asks for more?

Quite rightly feted now, to him belongs a true celebrity: he made the taste for ringing inwardness each chord prolongs.

My own were much more doubtful, based on half-heard melodies that led the ear to vague creations that the next effaced.

More disembodied, some have said. For here a music that entranced the soul was shaped in veils communing in some other sphere.

Indeed my last two symphonies escaped all precedents together, as the skin round which the notes themselves were lightly draped.

No one had heard such things before. Akin to nothing but projected hopes, and these evoking only further depths within.

That's all that I can say. What guarantees a piece of music is its inwrought shape.
Not worlds in movement like the restless trees, but more a woman seen in shawl or cape, whose very carriage speaks of charms unseen in haltered sweetness that we shan't escape.

A loving, giving thing it would demean both her and us to call but nature's schemes, by turns both innocent and libertine.

Dear Tatiana. How that prospect seems a frayed and distant world, and to my mind but sugared bon-bons seen through Moscow dreams.

Four children and a wife were left behind.
I lived with Tatiana openly, a toast to new-found life and art combined.

That set our country by the ears, so we removed abroad: America, to France, and Switzerland, but still the bourgeoisie denounced our heresy at every chance.

To me a radiant thing, both pure and rare:
for love, like music, is that cosmic dance of depth and dalliance, and in the air are coloured shapes we grasp at, which the mind will fill with apprehensions scarcely there.

Just notes, ineffable, that do not bind to things material, indeed are bare of comradeship that gives us humankind our hopes and purpose here. Why do we dare to find some meaning that reclothes the soul in love's high majesty we cannot wear?

And yet we always do, and more, console ourselves for all the hardship, pain and cost of spent concessions that become the whole.

Long centuries may pass; the works are lost to reputation, left to specialists, yet once that interval of taste is crossed how well they bloom again. Though once dismissed as over-conscious, artificial work, they have their presences, and still persist.

6. William Orpen

Certainly some sharp misfortunes lurk in painting diplomats and soldiering folk who want cathedrals where there's only kirk.

All carried worldly status with them, spoke of self-importance, destiny, the tacit rules that mitigate the empire's heavy yoke.

But I am Irish, and our history schools us in the manners that the English wear: I found my brushwork ruffed a line of fools.

In clothes and gestures, how they did their hair, we portraitists become the connoisseur in making viewers of our work aware just who these rich, parading worthies were:

be-medalled chests, sagacious heads, an eye perhaps to set the matron's heart astir — disclosing further depths, when all will try to navigate that stormy, hidden reach of character where no doubt shipwrecks lie.

Reserve, the social cachet, each to each the padded epaulets or corsetry: aloof the etiquettes we cannot breach.

Myself, I'd go for heartfelt gaiety, for good-time girls of stage and music hall, the laughing mistresses who make us see this gross hypocrisy of art on call that here's embellishing the social scene at costumed garden party, fete or ball.

If art's philandering, has only been a dressing up of things we would be for, with trusted confidant or go-between,

not so my great, blunt canvasses of war, with wave on wave of men sent on, who got the dodderers I'd painted years before.

Their wives and sweethearts good as shot by telegrams awaited, howling shells that would obliterate each blood-drenched spot.

What is the ignorance that so compels the very gentlemen who made my name, consign the other ranks to wretched hells?

No doubt I drank too much, and knew no shame in flaunting mistresses to pique my wife, yet new commissions flowed in just the same.

Then off to France I went, recording life for those who never knew how bullets go, or stench of bodies or the jabbing knife.

Lloyd George, the US President, Clemanceau and all in speaking likenesses, each one a living miracle my hands bestow on passing generations, each one run by stiff-necked statesmen and their staff evoking merit that their titles won.

The morning dress, the uniforms, the chaff of neighbourly deceptions, well-bred lies they told for friends or scoffing fame's behalf.

Around them shimmered the Palace of Versailles, resplendent mirrors with their lofty panes to magnify each gesture, every guise of warm humanity, where fine talk gains applause of millions, and the ruined towns must wait in silence on the snowy plains in war-torn Europe, have the pinch-beck crowns of bankrupt empires once more bar the gate to honest dealing, when the whole world drowns in sleights and fictions, where affairs of state are no concern of jumped-up serving men, to whom democracy has come too late.

Come, tell the mutilated: not again will come the manliness of how they were, the long, hot summers of their lives as then.

No Jack and Jill, no honest him and her, no world they'll make together, children bear, when each awakening into must incur a consciousness of what is gone, must dare them think beyond the reprimanding look in hurt's collusion, every guilty stare betrayed in edging by. In duty's book they left an entry, marking some such day when orders or their country's prompting took them on past crowds and bunting, on to pay for class and privilege that their England served as norms for countrymen, who had no say in what their social betters did, but nerved themselves for still more coming loss and pain, for what obedience in deed incurred.

Yet indisputably, though each campaign went on to ultimatums, total war, inherent decency could not abstain from thinking on, beyond the army corps, to quieter comradeship in life's hard school that made a future still worth fighting for.

7. Tamara Platonovna Karsavina

I was born to dance. Each length of tulle or gauze was destined for another dress, and so that daily-practiced childhood rule would make the great performer. Nonetheless I had to work consistently, and soon became my own unbending governess, who from each morning on to afternoon rehearsed in step on step that iron law that draws performers to the backdrop moon.

It was the body's spectre I'd explore — me, this small, aloof, pert, prancing thing — in childhood kingdoms all are searching for.

Which is to live abundantly, to fling our arms out, hug and enter each event, not merely tell of it, but dance and sing.

And that is difficult. My father went from principal to largely unemployed.
His rivals' work, he thought, a banishment from all he knew and loved, a life destroyed by dark intrigues, that tragic civil war of gross barbarities we'd none avoid.

A constant in our lives, which I foresaw as needing all my skills and gifts. I rose quite rapidly through school to ballet corps, and thence to ballerina, where I chose to dance the full Petipa repertoire that, challenging, is still rewarding those who helped me onwards to a trained desire: to have my muscles, body, breath and soul become intractable, untethered fire — when all the famous names, and every role with Fokine, Diaghilev and Balachine were worked according to their strict control.

All dance is hazardous, has always been.
Each move is fraught with effort, where we face a fall or misstep ending every scene.

Why do we dance and dance in any case?
Why do we give ourselves and all we hold most precious in this artificial place of strange successions as the nights unfold to yet more acts and movement, turning still as week on week the same forced tale is told?

I need not catalogue the parts that fill the repertoire today and have not aged, and danced with insight, which is more than skill.

Of course it's choreographed, of course it's staged.
We dancers live a life of servitude: indentured, tutored, strictly dressed and waged on pittances. Our earnest work is viewed as mere vocation, where we only put on demonstrations that we should exclude:

the laced-up architecture of the foot, the tendon spreads that interdigitate, us lightly settling there as soft as soot, yet still will bear aspiring body's weight, to leap and be alive, to greet each day as fresh denial of the endless freight of tired existence, where we work and stay within a habit, till it overwhelms us like that long-forgotten, first bouquet.

8. Ivan Bunin

I am of earliest Russia, those far realms that call out endlessly, for all they're worth, across the sky-soaked lines of distant elms.

And from a family that traced its birth to tsarist farms and settlements as give a place and purpose to this black-soil earth.

In that continuum our senses live:
there is a consciousness of happier times, some lingering residue from that rich sieve of life in memories: of sun that mimes the burnished metalwork of Tartar lands, and silvered nights on which the pale moon climbs to sovereign majesty, and, hovering, stands complicit with the soft, half-silent sounds of earth awakening, where the mole's small hands are ever moving under heaped-up grounds about the church and cemetery, the row of wheat-packed merchant houses that astounds us still to see them as they were, that go on holding up their mossy, speckled heads along the pot-holed track we used to know:

unchanged, immutable: that quietness spreads into the simple lives we onetime had as deep astonishment in newly-weds.

Here all is quiet and spacious, calm and sad, a Russian town asleep a summer night.
A thread of moonlight like an ample plaid lies thrown across the river, sparkling bright and dark together where past days recall the radiance echoed into steppe-land light.

For then our ears could hear the least leaf fall and eyes pick out the dusty Pleiades.

Then tirelessly we'd watch the swallows trawl the lakes for flies, the kestrel float at ease above the rise of thermals through the air, as crimson nestled in the smoky trees.

All known to me, all felt and made my care to sense, convey, to render so alive that readers are themselves existing there.

But not existing only, but will strive to sink with all their senses into, scent the snow's thin fizziness as rooks arrive, the hazel with its heavy catkins bent, the blaze of leaves beneath the outstretched sun, and all the happiness they represent.

To be alive and feel the spring begun within itself and have the golden shout in life that's echoing and never done with names and places that without a doubt we shall not see again, a world that's gone though still, continually, we think about.

How is that possible? The sun that shone upon a house or wood or field still shines as though eternally, and yet anon the vast and breathing world around resigns itself to what was then and of a time which, like the sun in splendour, then declines to what is scarcely there. The youth in prime of love or self-sufficiency, which each day draws to certainty, becomes a distant mime, a thin, faint shadow of itself, a cause we barely grasp at, though the waking day obeys habitually its self-same laws that turn unconscionable. Can we not say how brief and passing all our warm hours are, that life is bountiful but doesn't stay?

And shan't we stand in tears at that, and far from being comforted, would ever see that sadness trailing in the evening star?

That's what I am and write from, what I'll be to those who read my works, who with their eyes regain the wonder once reposed in me.

Why do we live and with renewed surprise pass by these miracles, and do not feel in each day done with more a little dies?

We should in reverence and quiet kneel and think of what is here as some new start towards the purposing our works reveal.

9. Dr. Rosemary Walker

A year, I told myself. The easy part is that you lose yourself in each new case, in names, in medications, progress chart.

You meet discouragements, in fact you face the prospect many here will shortly die, or not so shortly but with little grace.

No, turned or tossing from that patch of sky, removed, detached from others and aloof from all the others are the beds that lie in long straight rows beneath the rope-held roof, where friends and all their lives before now seem a disinfected other world, a mild reproof that we have failed them, that their stoic dream in modern medicine and white-man's ways have served to amputate their self-esteem.

For all are very proud: their solemn gaze is quite without reflection or surprise but seems accepting of the tranquil days.

And there you leave it, do not empathize but stay the doctor always, cut the nerve against a thinking on, where madness lies.

It is an obligation, where we serve a people on their final stage in life, within proprieties we both observe.

And must accept in time. You'll not be wife nor help your children through their daily cares, but learn the merits of the surgeon's knife that severs cleanly, keeps apart. Affairs are not encouraged here, nor are they wise:

the longings of the flesh come filled with snares.

A world of common effort without ties to anyone beyond some aptitude for playing master in some modern guise.

That first, full loving heart is not renewed, when all we might have been becomes the crutch of brave ambitions that were not pursued.

No doubt I'll die out here, or somewhere much the same, unknown and unregarded — one who gave and gained in time the friendly touch for others, native peoples overrun by war or pestilence, continued drought, the truly destitute who now have none but us to care and feed them, and without whose oath there would be nothing to reclaim from all the dried-up scrubland hereabout that spreads relentlessly, yet still the same, stays nature's source and simple, inmost seed.

We are God's creatures, all, and should not blame ourselves for what in time we do not heed, although we sense, become the more aware in others like us, of each human need.

For love is in our natures and a care for young ones that the savage tigers show, or birds inhabiting the broody air.

I think of that at times, for all we go on polished wheels, the true professional: alert, aloof but kindly, in the know about their true condition, interval of life that's left to them, the balance sheets of what we say to them, and must, and shall.

10. Marcel Proust

Time touches all those sun-bedazzled streets of Illiers and Paris boulevards with smells and madeleines in long retreats from youth's fresh incidents. Here drab facades were flush with carriages, and rich cravats were one with actresses in promenades.

Where have they gone, the gowns, the tall silk hats?
How does the true gratin descend by chance to charm and manners and to fireside chats?

The old regimes, the mounted knights that prance about in coloured shadows from a bedside lamp, the territories the ducal names advance, are living France, and one we can't revamp from small town manners, but from hard-learned ways that leave no philistine or boorish stamp.

To me then every single word or phrase would come inhabited with things not past but merely sleeping, as the daylight's blaze will throw an enervating, flatter cast on childhood memories of place or time, on things indelible that do not last.

Yet social hopes are all we have to climb from this dull world of class-bound rites that otherwise is childish pantomime.

And so in town and country, all the sights and smells, the tapestry of who we are — from subtle majesty of summer nights to lights and movements from a door ajar, from peddler's cries that rise from Paris streets, to names as apparitions from afar:

all now re-rooted in those balance sheets, that catch some flavour now of what has fled, by which we gather up past time's receipts.

And then the distant names become instead renewed in us, with the long-lost place of balls and dinner parties now not dead but set in aspic, as it were: some face that once enchanted us, or some such name that other names and heartaches can't replace.

These are our homes, our holy ground, that came to be without our wishing it, a treasured place that we remember, always, just the same.

The mother's kiss or glance that still would grace some truly fortunate and happy day, the steps to which we cannot now retrace.

They're gone. Entirely? That we cannot say but know at odd times yet there still returns the intimations of those shades that stray upon our inner thoughts — the hope that yearns for its accomplishment these long days since, that neurasthenic trait that never learns that we are fables like the fairy prince whom careless beauty kisses, then is gone beyond what commonsense might still convince us of: that time, that briefly taking on our bodies, clothes and name, some patch of ground on which illuminating sunlight shone, is only passing, as the others found to be receding like the backward wave we see continually in all around.

Why do we vacillate from birth to grave who have, we know, much worthier things to do than hold to backwardings we cannot save?

The sudden smile that's warm and true, the words once whispered that enchant the heart, the brief, sad look that lasts a lifetime through.

The which we call to mind, when all our art is bent on memories that by degrees become the kingdom where all truths must start.

11. Giacomo Leopardi

A quiet evening where there comes no breeze:
a tranquil autumn silence fills the air with seeming restlessness, and in the trees an importuning of vast nothings there, the isthmuses of days that lie around on earth that's otherwise and does not care.

But here in funeral monuments, in shaded ground that marks the halting passage of the dead lie true eternities, nor is there sound of that immensity, but winds instead that ruffle trees and hedgerows with a sense of long impatience at the angel's head.

We feel continually our going hence towards a glad extinction, deaths we hear forever drawing us from past events towards our tomb of inwardness, which year by year assumes the kernel of our lives through which how pointlessly we persevere.

For what? For some possessiveness that strives to keep us on a certain path we took from mutual loneliness in friends and wives?

What is our purpose here? Why do we look so fondly on the sunlight and the rain, the fall of evening on some much-read book?

We must go further, feel the joy and pain, the first soft breath of spring within the leaves and gathering richness as the long days wane.

The death of spouse and friends, the hope that grieves upon the far side of our growing fears, the happening that no regret reprieves.

What are our memories? And what inheres unchanged in us and does not go away, that dull precipitant of countless years that make each second, minute, hour or day inhabit us assenting, breathing things, which we consider with a wild amaze as self conceived, no more? That effort wrings such unbecomings from the future tense to which our purblind nature ever clings.

And yet and surely there are things we sense with our whole being, as the warm, soft breeze that springtime conjures up — a far, immense inauguration of new life, the trees re clothed again, the fields with gladness sown, and all the rich, soft scents of summer's ease, the which were only sleeping, promised, grown a parcel of our heritage that, ours today, where all we occupy we also own in endless boredoms of our lives, that stay both near and closed to us, forever rule the pathways out into the cold and grey.

12. Sri Aurobindo

So at Loretto House, a boarding school, I learnt the wherewithal of social class that turns out gentleman from would-be fool.

From grammar school to Cambridge, there to pass two happy, pointless years in reading Greek, concerns, like racing studs, put out to grass.

Returned to native service, first I'd speak of passive non-compliance, where to do the English bidding keeps our life-blood weak.

Deductions anyone could see were true:
I drew on incidents that every day the many suffered from the British few.

Regrettable that bomb, I have to say, indeed an outrage, killing others there.
For that, the perpetrators had to pay.

As did the advocates, which seemed but fair to that famed sense of British justice. I and others like me took especial care to offer no resistance, nor deny the merit of our case, or fail to tell the listening courtroom all the reasons why.

I went to prison briefly, where befell me strange adventures: there, with countrymen, I sank beneath an inward growing spell of vile unfathomings. In such a den with dacoits, thieves and casual murderers, our husbandry of truth was tasked again.

How long and earnestly would I rehearse my plans for India and its ancient poor, the vast inheritance that is our curse.

What hope for anything I could be for?
In those wild eyes, and gestures, tangled hair, there grew but obsolescent village lore.

All words but wasted in that foul, thick air that served inhabitants of every cell though still the soul of India was beating there.

I turned away, as will the village well collect the water seeping pore by pore through rocks, would with that thinking, slowly swell, becoming inner wholeness, ever more attuned to consciousness that far above, but also linked to us, sublimely soar those borderlands of all-abounding love.

A thing inherent in us, pressing, more companionable than is the nesting dove if we would welcome it, would so restore a true dimension to the glowing soul that was our birthright in long times before.

We're born in purity, in essence whole and self-delighting in our parent's pride before those depredations take their toll.

Those cursed attachments to the mere outside, the scented husk that hides the sovereign fruit, to which in falsities we stayed allied.

The rich deceptions that we can't refute, which spell attachment where our pain begins, the modesty that ends in ill-repute.

Our lives are like the whirling cotton gins returned with threaded sorrow time can't heal, where ripening majesty of beauty thins to fret and worry. There is no appeal from harming others, nor can we impart to others kindness we cannot feel.

From reefs to fathoms of the stormy heart, at last to contemplations deep within,
in giving of themselves all good lives start.

And are the sum of boundless discipline of breath and wholesomeness where our true mind is not the traveller from inn to inn but inward dwelling, whole and unconfined by place or time or passing circumstance, where empty pleasures of the flesh must bind but to the world of shadows, that expanse of longing, where our hurt has never ceased, like long attachment to a failed romance.

It should be happiness, to be released from suffering into that true company, and find our wants in this false world deceased.

13. Rainer Maria Rilke

Our death is but a going on. We see in essences a something of our ends and know as well with time how patiently are borne the sadnesses each evening sends to settlements of streets, apartment blocks, that abnegating, all-beseeking cry that rends our hearts. We watch in silence as the flocks of birds make scattered landfall: finding room as centuries in old cathedral clocks.

Each soul is benison and blessed tomb, is both the recklessness of youth and still the long nostalgia that the years assume:

a fragrance in the air it must distil as ancient magic out of autumn leaves.
Our life is ever what we can't fulfil of smiling comradeship that yet deceives, for all the bountiful, forgiving heart return in multiples what heart receives.

It lives in absence, has the hours impart their forward breathiness, will ever feel impetuously where all such natures start.

A song that moulds itself, the surgeon's steel dissolved in tenderness, the unlocked drawer, the porcelain that makes its rimmed appeal.

The open silverware that would implore us hold its iridescent heaviness, the grief-stained mirror that we can't restore to sovereign happiness, where shadows press against the outlines of some much-loved face and perturbations there we can't profess but sense continually, that tranquil grace the wind-tossed blossom holds to, ever bent from that true loveliness it would embrace.

All things have their continuum, their pent-up purposes in every flower or tree not given us, but day to day more lent to city avenues where shamelessly the summer gives itself: a shower of leaves with which the sunlight played perpetually.

Then comes the winter, where the high head grieves for what it loses, seeing over them a sense of passage out, which interweaves our life with others in that floating hem of further giving: things inanimate, which have their presence nonetheless, and stem from our releasing them, that natural state in which we lose identity, one got so painfully and after such a wait on this our grieving earth. All things are not for us, nor made for us, who swiftly pass beyond this briefly-tended garden spot.

Imperiously, in time's much-clouded glass, we lose the outlines of our lives, once earned as winds consorting with the summer grass, and so unconsciously, when we're concerned with simple restlessness that is our lives, while all around the smiling spring returned, reseeding sight with wonder, that revives the hidden nascent thing of how we were,

that sense, half lost in us, that still survives beyond the hopelessness the years confer, the grief in moss-trimmed headstone through the rain, that wealth of memories we can't inter:

the wasted fellowship, the sweet, half pain in syllables that made up someone's name we hardly hear but were the long refrain of all we listened to, the distant claim we had upon a world we couldn't plumb the depths of, ever, but in time became.

14. Envoi

If retrospects of memory should come to rule both living and the dead, how long the punishment deserved when we succumb to hurting others in the onward throng of obligations, paying what is owed reluctantly or not at all? The song denied that's heard along that crowded road with steady loss of what we one time were, untried, unburdened by this heavy load of heart's acknowledgement, that grainy blur in childhood photographs, the smiling thinned by what those recollections must incur.

With long-dried leaves, the whirling tawny wind collects of thousands in its thoughtless way, each one with happiness and grieving twinned.

Time fells the greatest monuments: there stay but stone and pediment with unknown names, the haughty pillars lapsed to wattled clay.

And, through the while, on men with different aims and strange conceptions, thoughts and febrile dreams, the dying sun goes down in muted flames.

We toil forever in those hidden seams of what is gangue at last, the drusy ores go on ahead, apart, the distant gleams we spend our whole lives searching for, a cause we're not to know the purpose of, but find as blessed entitlement when on those murmuring shores we stand in wonder, where with hopes combined we gather up the heartaches undergone that make perpetually our humankind.
